

region before the rainy season has started. Due to this factor they would pass over the dry strip as rapidly as possible, so the time during which one sees numbers of migrants (in the immediate vicinity of Barranquilla as opposed to El Recuerdo which is moister even before the rains start) would be shorter than in fall, as is in fact the case; pre-migrational concentrations (though of only a few days' duration) were noticeable at El Recuerdo but scarcely so in Barranquilla (or so brief as to go un-noted).

In summary: one can hypothesize on the basis of limited observations that in the fall the oncoming dry season forces the birds inland only slowly, whereas in spring the lingering coastal drought pushes the already-started migration on through to Central America or out over the sea quite rapidly.
